

CALL FOR MANUSCRIPTS

Health Sciences Review is a new peer-reviewed journal that publishes original reviews of literature in all health science areas including social work, public health, medicine, psychology, education, biology, earth science, and other disciplines. The goal of Health Sciences Review is to facilitate scientific breakthroughs in the understanding of phenomena that impact the health of specific populations by providing a central repository of critical syntheses of existing research that guide new research and practice efforts.

Health Sciences Review is interested in publishing original articles in the following areas:

- ❖ How theories and models are applied to health research and practice (including an assessment of how theories and models are adapted, ignored, or misused)
- ❖ Health conditions of populations (including, but not limited to, environmental, behavioral, personal, structural, clinical, and biological factors, or a combination thereof)
- ❖ The development of new health-related theories or models based on existing research
- ❖ Compare and contrast research findings for a particular population
- ❖ How health interventions have been adapted or tailored (including individual, group, community, or structural level interventions)
- ❖ How health phenomena have been measured (including consistency or inconsistency in terminology, measures, approaches, and other measurement areas)
- ❖ Strengths and weaknesses identified in a body of health literature
- ❖ Compare and contrast the scientific health information printed in the professional versus academic literature
- ❖ How new technologies are used in health research and practice (including technological innovations used to conduct assessments, collect data, review and summarize literature, implement interventions, and other uses)
- ❖ New or refined methods of conducting or presenting literature reviews
- ❖ Compare and contrast how health phenomena are represented in various bodies of literature
- ❖ Other critical analyses of health literature

To submit your manuscript to Health Sciences Review or to register as a reviewer, please visit www.hsr-online.com